CEO says

A COMPANY IN CONSTANT CHANGE

The only thing constant is change - a worn out phrase yet still very appropriate when describing the games industry over the last decade. We've seen big, established and influential companies like THQ and Atari either wholly or partially disappear. Others, such as Valve - the people behind Steam, have seen their power and influence grow enormously in a short time frame. I would wager that the speed with which a company can go from being very important to practically irrelevant is greater in the games industry than in many other sectors.

From the outside, this can appear to be a worrying state of affairs, but those of us who are active in the industry also know how this pressure has helped us to create competitive advantages. We need to work hard, fast and smart to stay relevant. In other industries, there is a lot of talk about going digital and developing digital strategies. The game industry is practically digitalised already so we don't talk about digital strategies, we talk about strategies - period.

At Paradox, we make no secret about the importance of evolving, improving and developing ourselves. This applies to the company as a whole, but also the products and services that we provide. A certain comfort with these types of changes is something that we require of everyone that works at Paradox. It is also something that our partners and players are expected to be ready to accept.

Among the bigger changes that we have gone through over years are: The shift from being solely a development studio to becoming a successful international publisher; the change in our game distribution model from physical to digital games and the general development of our own business models where we have, amongst other things, shifted away from working solely with base products (single games) to a model where we iterate on games and release content (eg. Expansions) over a longer period of time.

We have also experimented within a number of different business areas and channels, whereby some ideas were quickly discarded, while others have become large integrated parts of our operations. A good example of this is streaming and venturing into simulation games. Handled correctly, each new initiative offers new possibilities to us, irrespective of whether we choose to pursue it in the long term. An example of this is the way we have focused on producing a large portfolio which has increased the general awareness of Paradox and our titles, even if some of the individual games released have not been great successes.

To continue in the same vein and avoid becoming complacent, we believe that it is vital to both continue challenging ourselves while at the same time developing processes to act upon all the creative competences and ideas that already exist within the company

For that reason, we have now put in place: a person whose role is to create and develop processes; a board of innovation, in which I sit and an internal innovation task force made up of people from different parts of the company. The rest of the company and, to a certain extent, our community are also involved. So far this involvement has consisted of various types of customer questionnaires and experiments, in addition to a larger workshop which will be held later this spring.

We have always had a strong focus on leadership and in an ever-changing environment the strength of the leadership becomes even more important. At Paradox, we view every employee as a leader as self-leadership is a fundamental part of our culture.

We take on people with great capacity for self-leadership, but we also support this through leadership courses that are available to all our employees. The formal official leadership from our personnel managers is also something that we see as central and are always trying to develop. We have an organisation where our employees have, as shown in our employee satisfaction surveys, a very high level of confidence in their closest manager and in the leadership of the company in general, which is a massive strength for the company.

To develop ourselves as leaders is also something that have prioritised highly in the management team and, to this end, we have for many years worked actively with individual and group leadership, in order to move the organisation forward in the best possible way.

During the first quarter of 2017, we released an expansion to Crusader Kings II. The game keeps on performing well both in terms of bringing in new players and re-activating existing players. We have also participated in the Game Developers Conference in San Francisco during which we: met with existing and potential partners as we usually do; gave demonstrations of our games to the media and our developers took part of the educational conference. This year we also had several speakers as a part of the program for the conference participants.

During the conference we announced our partnership with Eugen Systems and that we are publishing their game, Steel Division. We also announced a new expansion for Europa Universalis IV - Mandate of Heaven and announced a release-date for Cities: Skylines on the Xbox, which came out on the 21st of April.

While this quarter has been relatively quiet with only one game release, we have been laying the groundwork for the coming quarter which will be jam-packed with activity such as: our publisher weekend on Steam; the releases of Steel Division, Europa Universalis IV: Mandate of Heaven and Stellaris: Utopia, Cities: Skylines on Xbox; our AGM and PDXCon - our own conference.

Of course we have more things going on than just those items, but I think that you by now have realized that we prefer to focus on what is confirmed and soon to be delivered upon rather than things that are planned for the future. One thing I can say though is that our future continues to be bright and that we look forward to having more news to share with you in the near future.

Releases during the quarter

CRUSADER KINGS II - MONKS AND MYSTICS

For centuries, the abbeys of Europe have had a sacred mission – to keep the flame of holy knowledge burning through an era of strife and to keep the secular powers on a righteous path. To the east, a mysterious new sect seeks out those who stray from the Prophet's path, using not-so-gentle means to remind the impious of the power of God. And, in the shadows, alchemists and religious usurpers challenge the current order. Rumors of dark sacrifices are whispered in taverns throughout the known world.

In Monks and Mystics, your characters can follow new paths in their search for religious enlightenment and holy blessing, joining sacred societies or secret brotherhoods that open new opportunities for role-playing and story-telling in one of the most popular historical strategy games ever made.
